

The Best of the Barefoot Farmer Volume I

Jeff's first book, The Best of the Barefoot Farmer Vol. I, is a compilation of his articles first published in the Macon County Chronicle and is influenced by countless years of organic and biodynamic farming. Comparable to curling up with your old Mother Earth News magazines, this book covers it all. Homesteading self-sufficiency through the year, from seeds to harvest, and everything that can happen along the way. You will enjoy reading and re-reading this book of old-time wisdom from the Barefoot Farmer. Coree White Entwistle comments, The Barefoot Farmer takes each reader on a tour of the farm, its seasons, its work, and its wonderful produce (including a few home-style recipes). Charming drawings of important biodynamic herbs open each chapter, and most essays are accented with more original artwork (by Linda Johnson), drawn from the Long Hungry Creek Farm. Read it cover to cover, use it as a garden inspiration and reference, or just open it at random to get a taste of Tennessee homestead goodness, wherever you are. Harvey C. Lisle comments, As you read the pages of this book you can picture yourself on a farm teeming with life. The farm, the experiences related to the farm and the food produced on the farm will all bring pleasures most people are not privileged to have. It is still true that it is the land which sustains us and Jeff deals with this subject beautifully. Chapter 1 - Elementals - Marketing - Community Supported Agriculture (I love the sound of that name) seems like a solution to many of the world's problems by reinvigorating rural areas with thriving gardens and getting fresh food directly to consumers. CSAs could interrelate so families could get dairy, meat, breads, fruits and vegetables all straight from the farms. People living within the rhythms of the seasons would feel more connected to the earth and nature and have a sense of satisfaction in supporting healthful farms. The modern trend of semi-trucking food across the country, fast food, junk food and poor health from poor eating could be replaced by local gardens and farms producing abundant quality food. Farmers would make their decisions based on their spiritual insight and intuition of what's best for their land, improving the natural environment without having to fret about money. In time, more young people would be attracted to farming as viable life work. With each farmer feeding 30 to 40 people or families, those not farming would still do their other jobs yet develop a closeness to the earth, helping their decision-making in various realms to be more earth-friendly.
