Cases of fuso-spirillary periodontal gingivitis are not by any means unknown to general civilian practice. Still, the almost epidemic nature of this disease among the armies affords an incomparably richer material as a basis upon which to develop satisfactory treatment. Teriscope Removal of Teeth in Fractures.--Differences of opinion among dental surgeons prevail as to the question of septic teeth. Some limit the operation of extraction to the teeth immediately adjacent to the fracture; others freely extract all teeth to which the term septic can be applied. In civil practice we must often have seen fractures of the maxilla and mandible unite, within an average period of from six to eight weeks, where no teeth, either clean or septic, have been removed. In cases of delayed union we have commonly found a loose tooth or a root in the line of fracture to be the cause. Furthermore, we have probably noticed that the extraction of the tooth on either side of the line of fracture, in a crowded dental arch, diminished the risk of delayed union from loose teeth, and prevented the after-formation of a gum pocket. But war practice has modified ones attitude toward the extraction of teeth. Mr. J. F. Colyer has lately demonstrated to us certain cases of delayed union of fractures caused by septic teeth. Teeth apparently remote from the line of fracture were found to be directly in connection with it by means of fissures running through the bone. This condition was quite unsuspected, and could only be observed in a radiogram. In future, therefore, we must pay more attention to the position of septic teeth in relation to the fracture, and our chief assistance will be found in a ...
